Overview

Hiring managers, talent acquisition teams, and internal recruiters often make decisions influenced by unconscious biases and flawed shortcuts in judgment that can unintentionally exclude qualified executive candidates. Biases can occur across any and all the recruiting, interview, and hiring processes.

Executives experiencing or anticipating bias must deploy job search strategies that factor in this reality and use pre-emptive mitigating tactics.

Biases That Influence Executive Hiring Decisions

Stereotyping based on age, race, gender, or education level is also widespread and can lead to rejection based on assumptions rather than executive merit. Similar effects are seen in name bias, where a candidate's name triggers judgments about ethnicity or background, and gender bias, which can discourage women from applying or result in unequal evaluations.

One of the most prevalent forms is affinity bias, where recruiters favor candidates with similar backgrounds, interests, or traits, such as having attended the same school or growing up in the same area. Confirmation bias often follows, where recruiters form an early impression and seek information that reinforces it, overlooking contradictory evidence.

Other influential biases include the halo/horns effect, where one strong or weak trait skews overall judgment; first impression error, where early opinions outweigh actual qualifications; and beauty bias, where physical appearance affects perceived competence.

Cognitive shortcuts like affect heuristics, illusory correlations, and contrast bias also distort evaluations, whether by associating unrelated traits with success or unfairly comparing candidates to others in the lineup. On hiring panels, groupthink can reinforce shared preferences and suppress dissenting views.

How Bias Shows Up In The Executive Recruiting Process

Bias influence can occur across every stage of the recruiting, interviewing, and hiring process. It starts with job postings, which may unintentionally target narrow applicant pools. During resume screening, candidates may be filtered out based on age, name, education, or previous employers, especially when AI-driven ATS systems lack context.

Strategies And Tactics For Executive Job Seekers Experiencing Or Anticipating Bias

The reality is there's no cure for bias in the executive recruiting, interviewing, and hiring process; as such, executive job seekers must deploy tactics and strategies to improve their chances of landing an interview with a hiring decision maker. Here are three of the most potent tactics for mitigating biases:

1. Remove bullet points and statements in your resume and LinkedIn profile that state the number of years of experience. For example, 30 years of sales and marketing experience. Instead, use "highly experienced".
2. Remove dates of college graduation, education, and certifications from your resume and LinkedIn profile.
3. Omit anything related to politics, religion, sustainability, diversity, moral issues, woke, guns, or any divisive issue in your interview conversation, resume, and LinkedIn profile.

Conclusion

Bias is a reality that must be contended with by job-seeking executives. By anticipating and pre-empting it using the suggested mitigating tactics, the chances of landing a new and desirable role improve dramatically.
